

INSTRUCTIONS FOR ASSESSMENT OF THE ELECTION PROCESS

Introduction

These assessment forms are designed to gain a general impression of the election process of the particular country.

Election Laws

As an assessor, you should have some basic knowledge of the country's election law and the election process at the polling station. This would include: the structure and role of the precinct election commission (PEC); who is eligible to vote; what constitutes the voter list; what identification is permitted; what constitutes a supplemental voter list; ballot security; absentee certificates; privacy booths; the presence of domestic and international observers; the counting process; obtaining a copy of the protocols; as well as where and how results are sent to the Central Election Commission.

Advance Work

The purpose of going two days in advance of election day is to determine voter interest, how candidates, political parties, associations and blocs have been campaigning, how the media has been covering the campaign, as well as the state of the preparations for election day on the part of the election commissions at the subject, district, territorial, and precinct levels.

On your first day on location, obtain a map of the region where you are located. It should be large enough to encompass entire territories, but detailed enough to find polling stations. With what you have learned in your two days at your location, you should choose a territory or part of a territory to cover on election day. Once you have chosen the territory, go to its election commission and get a list of its polling stations. From this list, choose 12-15 polling stations to visit during election day. Familiarize yourself with the assessment forms before going out on election day, so that it will be easier for you to fill out the forms.

Election Day

Find out when the polls open. Plan to arrive at your first polling station at least one hour in advance. Observe the entire poll opening process as well as the first voters voting and complete the assessment forms. Then you should proceed to another 8-11 polling stations during the day. For polling stations that you find troublesome, you may want to return to them later in the day. (If this happens, you will obviously see less than 10 polling stations during the day.) You should also try to accompany a mobile ballot box from a polling site. To assess the closing of the polls and the vote count, you may want to choose the polling station you found most troublesome, and plan to arrive there by 30 minutes prior to the closing time. Assessors should be familiar with some of the common forms of voter fraud and have some knowledge of the routine (minor) mistakes that are often committed by PECs.

Forms

There are three kinds of forms: One is for the opening of the polls, another is for use during election day, and the third is for the counting of the ballots. Try to be as thorough as possible when completing the forms, and complete them while at the polling station. In a few situations, you may find that you can't answer every question. Just do the best you can. By the end of the day, you will probably see the same activities in most polling stations. Record your answers to any open-ended questions or comments on the back of the form or in a notepad, if you do not have enough space on the front of the page. Note any disagreements between commissioners, voters, domestic observers and security. Upon entering the polling station, you should introduce yourself to the Chair and members of the precinct commission and show your credentials.

GENERAL RULES OF OBSERVATION.

1. Be polite and impartial no matter what happens or how you are treated.
 2. Introduce yourself to the Chair and all members of the Commission. Show your identity card from the Central Election Commission.
 3. Do not interfere in the election process. You are there to monitor -not to conduct- the election process.
 4. If you see problems, fraud or mistakes, make a detailed note of them. You may question the chair and others about such mistakes, but you may not order him/her around.
 5. Remove yourself from any dangerous situations immediately.

QUESTIONS FOR PRE-ELECTION DAYS

Try to get a sense of how the populace feels about the elections.

Do they think they are fair and open?

Do they think the elections make any difference?

Is there active interest in trying to promote democracy and participation in the elections?

Are there viable political parties?

Who are the major political parties in the subject? Are they the same ones in the area you visited?

Is there a candidate or party that appears to be more dominant in this area?

If yes, which ones?

Does there appear to be much interest in the election?

Is the governor (or leader of the subject) a dominant factor in the election?

Is the mayor or some other locally elected official a dominant factor in the election?

Is the mass media coverage equal among all the candidates?

Are the elections commissions (i.e. subject, territorial, and precinct) prepared for the elections? Do they know the changes to the Basic Guarantees Law and the new Duma Election Law?
